ABSTRACT

Presented are six documents concerning the Supreme Court decision in the O'Connor v. Donaldson case on the constitutional rights of civilly committed mental patients. Covered in a preliminary analysis of the major issues and some implications for mental health providers are the topics of immediate impact of the decision, the right to treatment, continuing confinement, liability of state hospital officials, and issues left undecided. Provided is a brief notice for mental patients regarding their constitutional rights, and noted in the report on legal services to the institutionalized poor is that lack of mobility is a major obstacle for involuntarily confined persons. Also included are copies of the syllabus, the opinion for a unanimous Court delivered by Justice Potter Stewart, and a concurring opinion filed by Chief Justice Warren Burger regarding the O'Connor v. Donaldson case. (SB)

Last June, for the first time in this century, the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a decision on the constitutional rights of civilly committed mental patients. The issues and the opinion in O'Connor v. Donaldson were extremely narrow. Nevertheless, the decision has great potential significance for future legal developments relating to the provision of mental health care.

This case decided few issues, but raised many more. These will require a continuing cooperative effort by the legal and mental health communities to assure resolutions that will best serve the clients of the mental health care system. The Supreme Court's opinion is also a valuable source for current legal attitudes about mental illness and psychiatric expertise.

Both the direct impact of the decision and its indirect effect will necessarily vary from State to State depending on differing laws and circumstances. An opinion from the State Attorney General may be the best way to insure against possible misapprehensions regarding the local application of the decision based on nationally-focused interpretations.

With that caveat, it is our hope that this package may assist you in identifying and examining some of the issues raised by the case. Included are a copy of the slip opinion in O'Connor v. Donaldson, a preliminary analysis of the major issues and some implications for mental health care providers, as viewed by the NIMH staff, along with several other items. Let me emphasize that all views expressed are preliminary, and should be seen as part of a continuing process of discussion. Your comments and reactions are invited.

The direct impact of this decision will fall on States and institutions which have patients fitting the description of Kenneth Donaldson, that is, involuntary patients who are not dangerous, are capable of surviving in the community, and are receiving only custodial care. While developments in the mental health field over the past two decades have rendered such cases increasingly rare, the Donaldson decision can provide an incentive to reexamine institutional populations and procedures to determine whether some patients continue to be inappropriately confined and, if so, the reasons for this. (See, for example, "Appropriate Placement of Resident Patients in Texas State Mental Hospitals," Statistical Note 121, available on request from the Division of Biometry, NIMH.)

Such reviews might be helpful not only in identifying patients who should be released, but in documenting the causes of their continued confinement, such as a lack of funds for adequate support services in communities. The Supreme Court's opinion may itself be helpful to support requests for community mental health resources. The opinion emphasizes the right to liberty unless confinement is demonstrably necessary (see page 8-9 of the attached analysis). The recognition of the need for community support implicit in the phrase "capable of surviving safely in freedom by himself or with the help of willing and responsible family members or friends" could be particularly useful.

Some patients may express an interest in the decision and ask about its possible effect on them. Depending on local policies and on the availability of lawyers for patients, a simple notification of the decision and referral to legal counsel might help to reduce problems in advising patients on this matter. A sample notice is included in this package for your information.

Let me mention a few additional related matters. A panel discussion on recent decisions on the right to treatment was held during the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration's Annual Conference of the State and Territorial Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Authorities on November 5 at the Shoreham Hotel in Washington, D.C. The panel included Mr. Bruce Ennis of the New York Civil Liberties Union, Ms. Mary Clark, Legal Counsel to the Florida Department of Health and Rehabilitation Services, and Dr. Walter Barton, formerly Medical Director, American Psychiatric Association, and was moderated by Dr. Tom Plaut, Acting Deputy Director, NIMH.

At its recent annual meeting the American Bar Association adopted a resolution supporting the right to counsel for institutionalized poor persons in civil legal matters. A copy of the resolution and report is attached. This action adds impetus to the trend in courts and legislatures alike to require that mental patients be represented by counsel at all hearings on commitment to institutional care.

The NIMH Center for Studies of Crime and Delinquency has recently published a monograph entitled Mental Health and Law: A System in Transition, by Alan A. Stone, M.D., Professor of Law and Psychiatry, Harvard University, and Chairman of the American Psychiatric Association's Committee on Judicial Action. Copies are available from the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402, for $2.65 a copy. Specify GPO Stock Number 1724-00454.

Two additional resources will also become available in the coming months. One is a Legislative Guide examining State Mental Health Legislation issues, a two-year project now nearing completion by the Mental Health Law Project under contract from NIMH. The second is the Mental Disability Law Reporter, which the American Bar Association Commission on the Mentally Disabled has just begun to develop with American Bar Endowment and foundation funding in addition to NIMH support. Further details on obtaining these publications will be forthcoming when they are available.

Finally, I would like to express my personal conviction that the Donaldson decision is an important victory for everyone who believes that the mentally ill should receive treatment and not merely custodial confinement. But it may turn out to be a hollow victory, unless society as a whole, along with the mental health and legal communities, is willing to provide for the kind of treatment and support that will enable mentally ill persons whenever possible, either on their own or with the help of family or friends, to live in the community.

Analysis and Implications Of The Supreme Court's Decision in O'Connor v. Donaldson
95 S.Ct. 2486 (1975)

A unanimous Supreme Court held on June 26, 1975 that "a State cannot constitutionally confine without more a nondangerous individual who is capable of surviving safely in freedom by himself or with the help of willing and responsible family members or friends." (p. 12, slip opinion) The landmark decision in O'Connor v. Donaldson recognizes that mental illness alone is not a sufficient basis for denying an individual his fundamental right to liberty.

Immediate Impact

The immediate impact of the decision is limited to patients who, like Kenneth Donaldson, are: (1) involuntarily committed, (2) receiving only custodial care, (3) not dangerous to themselves or to others, and (4) capable of surviving safely in the community alone or with help. Any such patient has a right to his or her liberty. The precise application of the Supreme Court's decision to varying categories of patients in different States requires interpretation at the State level.

The Right to Treatment

The Court did not recognize a constitutional right to treatment. It vacated the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals decision in Donaldson v. O'Connor, 493 F.2d 507 (1974), defining a constitutional right to "such treatment as will give (the patient) a realistic opportunity to be cured or to improve his mental condition." That decision is no longer binding in the Fifth Circuit, nor is it to be used as precedent elsewhere. However, in Wyatt v. Aderholt, 503 F.2d 1305 (5th Cir., 1974), that Circuit adopted the same definition of treatment as a constitutional right. Wyatt presumably remains valid, since the Supreme Court had the opportunity to review, but refused. (The Supreme Court refused to review Burnham v. Georgia, 503 F. 2d , the companion case to Wyatt.) Chief Justice Burger — in his concurring opinion in Donaldson — did reject the concept of a constitutional right to treatment as defined by the Fifth Circuit. Since no other

Justice joined his opinion, it is impossible to know where the rest of the Court stands. The holding is somewhat ambiguous on the issue: "a State cannot constitutionally confine without more a nondangerous individual ...." (emphasis added). However, the phrase "without more" probably means "without more than custodial care."

At the same time, the Court summarily rejected the argument that, where treatment is the rationale for commitment, the adequacy of treatment provided is a ~~non-justiciable~~ question that should be left to medical experts. It stated that "(w)here 'treatment' is the sole asserted ground for depriving a person of liberty it is plainly unacceptable to suggest that the courts are powerless to determine whether the asserted ground is present." (p. 10, n. 10). While the definition of "adequate treatment" was thus left unresolved, the role of courts in developing such a definition was recognized.

Continuing Confinement

The Court further holds that there must be a continuing basis for commitment: "Nor is it enough that Donaldson's original confinement was founded upon a constitutionally adequate basis ... because even if his involuntary confinement was initially permissible, it could not constitutionally continue after that basis no longer existed." (p. 11). This implies that States have a continuing obligation to assure meaningful periodic assessment of involuntary patients.

The Court, significantly, showed itself unwilling to sanction confinement that is not demonstrably necessary: "The mere presence of mental illness does not disqualify a person from preferring his home to the comforts of an institution. Moreover, while the State may arguably confine a person to save him from harm, incarceration is rarely if ever a necessary condition for raising the living standards of those capable of surviving safely in freedom on their own or with the help of family or friends." (pp. 11-12). It relied here on the established legal doctrine that where the government has a valid purpose for overriding an individual's constitutional right, it must nevertheless show that the means it has chosen to accomplish that purpose will not limit the individual's rights any more than is really necessary.

Liability of State Hospital Officials

Under this decision State hospital officials can be held personally liable for violating a patient's constitutional right to liberty. The standard to be used in such determinations is "whether (the official)

'knew or reasonably should have known that the action he took within his sphere of official responsibility would violate the constitutional rights of (the patient), or if he took the action with the malicious intention to cause a deprivation of constitutional rights or other injury to (the patient)." (emphasis added)(p. 13) The Court remanded the issue of Dr. O'Connor's liability to be reexamined by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in accordance with this standard. The Court added that an official has no duty to anticipate unforeseeable constitutional developments. But regardless of the outcome of Dr. O'Connor's case, the liability of hospital officials for violations of established constitutional rights -- including the right to liberty recognized in the Donaldson case -- is now law.

An important point for future clarification will be the demarcation of "sphere(s) of official responsibility" within hospitals. This will enable hospital staff, as well as courts, to identify the staff members who may be exposed to liability for specific actions they take.

Issues Left Undecided

The Court explicitly identified two issues which it would not decide in this case:

First, whether mentally ill persons who are dangerous to themselves or to others have a right to treatment when involuntarily confined. While leaving "dangerousness" undefined, the Court emphasized the importance of identifying specific dangerous behavior, rather than reliance primarily on a professional diagnosis of mental illness. However, it noted that even where there is no "foreseeable risk of self-injury or suicide a person is literally 'dangerous to himself' if for physical or other reasons he is helpless to avoid the hazards of freedom..." (p. 10, n. 9) The terms "helpless" and "hazards of freedom" also await clarification in future litigation or legislation.

Second, whether the State may involuntarily confine a nondangerous mentally ill person for the purpose of treating him. The Court was unanimous in deciding that this issue was not presented in the Donaldson case and therefore should not be addressed. Chief Justice Burger, in his concurring opinion, rejected the "quid pro quo" theory (treatment as a "trade-off" for deprivation of liberty). On the one hand, this theory might justify confinement wherever some treatment is provided; on the other, it might prevent the State from protecting those for whom no treatment was available. (Concurring opinion pp. 11-12)

Among the issues most likely to be raised in litigation or the legislative process following the Donaldson decision are: (1) Constitutionally acceptable procedures and criteria for involuntary commitment; (2) The definition of "dangerous," as established by statute and as applied in practice; (3) The existence and implementation of a right to treatment; (4) The right to the "least restrictive alternative" setting for treatment; and (5) The constitutional and functional distinction between voluntary and involuntary commitment.

LEGAL SERVICES TO THE INSTITUTIONALIZED POOR

RESOLVED, that the American Bar Association calls on the Legal Services Corporation to assure that civil legal services are made available no less to the poor in institutions than to other poor people. To meet this objective, the civil legal needs of confined juveniles, prisoners, and the mentally disabled should be ascertained and appropriate funds allocated, and further

RESOLVED, that the President or such agency of the Association as he may designate is authorized to present these views to the Legal Services Corporation, and to counsel or assist the Corporation in identifying the civil legal needs of the poor in institutions, and to assist the Corporation in securing funds to identify and provide such legal services.

REPORT

In 1970, the Census found that 2.1 million persons were inmates of prisons, mental hospitals, juvenile facilities and similar institutions. Because of the temporary nature of residency in such places -- especially jails and juvenile detention institutions -- an even greater number of individuals pass through their doors each year. To a large extent, unfortunately, their civil legal needs are unassessed and unaddressed.

Almost uniformly, the institutionalized population is poor. Indeed, in most regards the concept of the means test to check eligibility for free legal services is superfluous for involuntarily confined persons. . 1/ But they face an even more substantial obstacle to securing legal aid: the poor in institutions lack mobility. In most cases, they cannot go to the community's usual provider of free legal services for necessary assistance. The community must come to them, if they are to be served.

In a series of decisions the Supreme Court has clearly held that conviction does not extinguish one's right of access to the courts, and that the confining authority must not administratively impede that access unreasonably. Thus, prison inmates must be permitted to assist one another on habeas corpus petitions and other substantial claims for relief when there is not another available and adequate source of legal assistance. 2/ Juveniles and inmates of mental hospitals have similar if not greater rights.

In the prison area, the burden of making adequate legal aid available has largely fallen on two entities -- the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration and the regular budget of the particular correctional agency. There has been some funding of prison legal services through local Office of Economic Opportunity legal services programs and at least one instance of Social Security and Rehabilitative Services Administration (HEW) funding. These appear to be unstable sources of funds for a service which must be continuous. Grants are typically for a short term and, at least as regards LEAA, largely demonstration funds intended to cease after a few years of developing a concept. Correctional agency funding means one party potentially controls the other's access to legal services, a clearly untenable arrangement.

No brighter picture may be painted respecting the mentally disabled. Few programs are known to provide any representation to these persons. What services are available are minimal. A real danger exists that inadequately funded programs will never reach those needing their services since the mentally disabled may not know of their legal rights, or may not be able even to express a desire for assistance.

In a survey of 42 correctional services units for juveniles, the National Assessment of Juvenile Corrections found that two thirds of the responding youth had not even been talked to by staff about their legal rights. It was also the feeling of only 35 percent of the respondents that staff would help them contact a lawyer. 3/

1. The current official guidelines hold that a single individual with an income below $2590 is poor; for a family of four the figure is $5050. The nation's estimated poverty population was 23 million in 1973. In 44 States, inmates can make no more than $1 per day from prison jobs. 3. Unpublished data in letter to Commission on Correctional Facilities and Services from National Assessment of Juvenile Corrections, April 4, 1975.

A variety of organizations have recognized the legitimate needs of the institutionalized poor for civil legal services. 4/ That is not at issue. Legal services funding stands at a crossroads. The Legal Services Corporation is mandated to assure that the legal aid needs of the poor are addressed.

It is possible, however, that in taking up the reins of management of the legal services program, the needs of groups not now provided for will not be adequately included in planning and funding decisions. Enormously difficult decisions have to be made. 5/

It would be an appropriate act of statesmanship and leadership for the American Bar Association, with its long record of support for legal services programs, and its extensive work in the areas of corrections, the mentally disabled and juveniles, to call upon the Legal Services Corporation to recognize and meet the needs of these groups. 6/

Our Commissions have submitted this joint report to facilitate consideration by the Association of problems which have arisen in our separate fields of endeavor. Based on the available data and literature, we believe that juveniles face similar problems in securing legal assistance. Correspondence with the Commission on Juvenile Justice Standards indicates this is the case. Nevertheless, pending further development and release of its standards, the Commission on Juvenile Justice Standards felt it inappropriate to take any formal position in this matter.

4. National Advisory Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals, Report on Corrections, Standard 2.2 Access to Legal Services (1973); President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, Task Force Report: Corrections 85 (1967). Existing American Bar Association standards go beyond current law and call for the provision of counsel in all criminal proceedings and related civil proceedings (extradition, mental competency, post-conviction relief) to any person who is personally financially unable to obtain adequate representation. Standards Relating to Providing Defense Services, Standards 4.1 and 4.2 (Approved 1968).
5. See Speaker, "Funding the New Legal Services Corporation," Alternatives 3 (Feb. 1975).
6. Under the Legal Services Corporation Act, the Legal Services Corporation is prohibited from funding assistance relating to "criminal proceedings or to provide legal assistance in civil actions to persons who have been convicted of a criminal charge where the civil action arises out of alleged acts or failures to act and the action is brought against an officer of the court or against a law enforcement official for the purpose of challenging the validity of the criminal conviction . . ." Thus, it appears to be well within the Corporation's charter to provide funds for the ordinary civil problems of the incarcerated poor (domestic relations, landlord-tenant, etc.) and problems arising out of the conditions of confinement where the validity of a conviction is not at issue.

NOTICE TO PATIENTS

The United States Supreme Court recently ruled that a mental patient who has been involuntarily hospitalized, who is not dangerous to himself or to others, who is receiving only custodial care, and who is capable of living safely in the community has a constitutional right to liberty -- that is, has a right to be released from the hospital. The Supreme Court's opinion is available for patients to read.

If you think that the Supreme Court ruling may have a bearing on your present status, please feel free to discuss the matter with the hospital staff. In addition, if you wish to talk with an attorney about the meaning of the Supreme Court decision and how it may apply to you, the Superintendent has a list of legal organizations that may be of assistance. The staff will be glad to aid anyone who wishes to contact a lawyer.

ERRATA:

An explanatory paragraph should have immediately preceded the Notice to Patients on page 15. The explanation was given on page 6, paragraph 2, as follows:

"Some patients may express an interest in the decision and ask about its possible effect on them. ### O'CONNOR v. DONALDSON

CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT

No. 74-8. Argued January 15, 1975—Decided June 26, 1975

Respondent, who was confined almost 15 years "for care, maintenance, and treatment" as a mental patient in a Florida State Hospital, brought this action for damages under 42 U. S. C. § 1983 against petitioner, the hospital's superintendent, and other staff members, alleging that they had intentionally and maliciously deprived him of his constitutional right to liberty. The evidence showed that respondent, whose frequent requests for release had been rejected by petitioner notwithstanding undertakings by responsible persons to care for him if necessary, was dangerous neither to himself nor others, and, if mentally ill, had not received treatment. Petitioner's principal defense was that he had acted in good faith, since state law, which he believed valid, had authorized indefinite custodial confinement of the "sick," even if they were not treated and their release would not be harmful, and that petitioner was therefore immune from any liability for monetary damages. The jury found for respondent and awarded compensatory and punitive damages against petitioner and a codefendant. The Court of Appeals, on broad Fourteenth Amendment grounds, affirmed the District Court's ensuing judgment entered on the verdict. Held:

1. A State cannot constitutionally confine, without more, a non-dangerous individual who is capable of surviving safely in freedom by himself or with the help of willing and responsible family members or friends, and since the jury found, upon ample evidence, that petitioner did so confine respondent, it properly concluded that petitioner had violated respondent's right to liberty. Pp. 9-12.

petitioner concerning his claimed reliance on state law as authorization for respondent's continued confinement, and since neither court below had the benefit of this Court's decision in Wood v. Strickland, 420 U. S. 308, on the scope of a state official's qualified immunity under 42 U. S. C. § 1983, the case is vacated and remanded for consideration of petitioner's liability vel non for monetary damages for violating respondent's constitutional right. Pp. 13-14.

STEWART, J., delivered the opinion for a unanimous Court. BURGER, C. J., filed a concurring opinion.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 74-8

J. B. O'Connor, Petitioner,  v. Kenneth Donaldson.)	On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

MR. JUSTICE STEWART delivered the opinion of the Court.

The respondent, Kenneth Donaldson, was civilly committed to confinement as a mental patient in the Florida State Hospital at Chattahoochee in January of 1957. He was kept in custody there against his will for nearly 15 years. The petitioner, Dr. J. B. O'Connor, was the hospital's superintendent during most of this period. Throughout his confinement Donaldson repeatedly, but unsuccessfully, demanded his release, claiming that he was dangerous to no one, that he was not mentally ill, and that, at any rate, the hospital was not providing treatment for his supposed illness. Finally, in February of 1971, Donaldson brought this lawsuit under 42 U. S. C. § 1983, in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Florida, alleging that O'Connor, and other members of the hospital staff, named as defendants, had intentionally and maliciously deprived him of his constitutional right to liberty.<sup>1</sup> After a four-day trial, the

<sup>1</sup> Donaldson's original complaint was filed as a class action on behalf of himself and all of his fellow patients in an entire department of the Florida State Hospital at Chattahoochee. In addition to a damage claim, Donaldson's complaint also asked for habeas corpus relief ordering his release, as well as the release of all members of the jury returned a verdict assessing both compensatory and punitive damages against O'Connor and a codefendant. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the judgment, 493 F. 2d 507. We granted O'Connor's petition for certiorari, 419 U. S. 894, because of the important constitutional questions seemingly presented.

I

Donaldson's commitment was initiated by his father, who thought that his son was suffering from "delusions." After hearings before a county judge of Pinellas County, Florida, Donaldson was found to be suffering from "paranoid schizophrenia" and was committed for "care, maintenance, and treatment" pursuant to Florida statutory provisions that have since been repealed.<sup>2</sup> The state law class. Donaldson further sought declaratory and injunctive relief requiring the hospital to provide adequate psychiatric treatment.

After Donaldson's release and after the District Court dismissed the action as a class suit, Donaldson filed an amended complaint, repeating his claim for compensatory and punitive damages. Although the amended complaint retained the prayer for declaratory and injunctive relief, that request was eliminated from the case prior to trial. See Donaldson v. O'Connor, 493 F. 2d 507, 512-513.

<sup>2</sup> The judicial commitment proceedings were pursuant to § 394.22 (11) of the State Public Health Code, which provided:

"Whenever any person who has been adjudged mentally incompetent requires confinement or restraint to prevent self-injury or violence to others, the said judge shall direct that such person be forthwith delivered to a superintendent of a Florida state hospital, for the mentally ill, after admission has been authorized under regulations approved by the board of commissioners of state institutions, for care, maintenance, and treatment, as provided in sections 394.09, 394.24, 394.25, 394.26 and 394.27, or make such other disposition of him as he may be permitted by law . . . ."

1955-1956 Fla. Laws Extra. Sess., c. 31403, § 1, 62.

Donaldson had been adjudged "incompetent" several days earlier under § 394.22 (1), which provided for such a finding as to any person who was

"incompetent by reason of mental illness, sickness, drunkenness, was less than clear in specifying the grounds necessary for commitment, and the record is scanty as to Donaldson's condition at the time of the judicial hearing. These matters are, however, irrelevant, for this case involves no challenge to the initial commitment, but is focused, instead, upon the nearly 15 years of confinement that followed.

The evidence at the trial showed that the hospital staff had the power to release a patient, not dangerous to himself or others, even if he remained mentally ill excessive use of drugs, insanity, or other mental or physical condition, so that he is incapable of caring for himself or managing his property, or is likely to dissipate or lose his property or become the victim of designing persons, or inflict harm on himself or others . . . ." 1955 Fla. Gen. Laws, c. 29909, § 3, 831.

It would appear that § 394.22 (11)(a) contemplated that involuntary commitment would be imposed only on those "incompetent" persons who "require[d] confinement or restraint to prevent self-injury or violence to others." But this is not certain, for § 394.22 (11)(c) provided that the judge could adjudicate the person a "harmless incompetent" and release him to a guardian upon a finding that he did "not require confinement or restraint to prevent self-injury or violence to others and that treatment in the Florida state hospital is unnecessary or would be without benefit to such person . . . ." 1955 Fla. Gen. Laws, c. 29909, § 3, 835 (emphasis added). In this regard, it is noteworthy that Donaldson's "Order for Delivery" to the Florida State Hospital provided that he required "confinement or restraint to prevent self-injury or violence to others, or to insure proper treatment." (Emphasis added.) At any rate, the Florida, commitment statute provided no judicial procedure whereby one still incompetent could secure his release on the ground that he was no longer dangerous to himself or others.

Whether the Florida statute provided a "right to treatment" for involuntarily committed patients is also open to dispute. Under § 394.22 (11)(a), commitment "to prevent self-injury or violence to others" was "for care, maintenance, and treatment." Recently Florida has totally revamped its civil commitment law and now provides a statutory right to receive individual medical treatment. 14A Fla. Stat. Ann. § 394.459.

and had been lawfully committed.<sup>3</sup> Despite many requests, O'Connor refused to allow that power to be exercised in Donaldson's case. At the trial, O'Connor indicated that he had believed that Donaldson would have been unable to make a "successful adjustment outside the institution," but could not recall the basis for that conclusion. O'Connor retired as superintendent shortly before this suit was filed. A few months thereafter, and before the trial, Donaldson secured his release and a judicial restoration of competency, with the support of the hospital staff.

The testimony at the trial demonstrated, without contradiction, that Donaldson had posed no danger to others during his long confinement, or indeed at any point in his life. O'Connor himself conceded that he had no personal or secondhand knowledge that Donaldson had ever committed a dangerous act. There was no evidence that Donaldson had ever been suicidal or been thought likely to inflict injury upon himself. One of O'Connor's codefendants acknowledged that Donaldson could have earned <sup>3</sup> The sole statutory procedure for release required a judicial reinstatement of a patient's "mental competency." Public Health Code §§ 394.22 (15), (16), 1955 Fla. Gen. Laws c. 29909, § 3, 838-841. But this procedure could be initiated by the hospital staff. Indeed, it was at the staff's initiative that Donaldson was finally restored to competency, and liberty, almost immediately after O'Connor retired from the superintendency.

In addition, witnesses testified that the hospital had always had its own procedure for releasing patients—for "trial visits," "home visits," "furloughs," or "out of state discharges"—even though the patients had not been judicially restored to competency. Those conditional releases often became permanent, and the hospital merely closed its books on the patient. O'Connor did not deny at trial that he had the power to release patients; he conceded that it was his "duty" as superintendent of the hospital "to determine whether that patient having once reached the hospital was in such condition as to request that he be considered for release from the hospital."

his own living outside the hospital. He had done so for some 14 years before his commitment, and immediately upon his release he secured a responsible job in hotel administration.

Furthermore, Donaldson's frequent requests for release had been supported by responsible persons willing to provide him any care he might need on release. In 1963, for example, a representative of Helping Hands, Inc., a halfway house for mental patients, wrote O'Connor asking him to release Donaldson to its care. The request was accompanied by a supporting letter from the Minneapolis Clinic of Psychiatry and Neurology, which a codefendant conceded was a "good clinic." O'Connor rejected the offer, replying that Donaldson could be released only to his parents. That rule was apparently of O'Connor's own making. At the time, Donaldson was 55 years old, and, as O'Connor knew, Donaldson's parents were too elderly and infirm to take responsibility for him. Moreover, in his continuing correspondence with Donaldson's parents, O'Connor never informed them of the Helping Hands offer. In addition, on four separate occasions between 1964 and 1968, John Lembecke, a college classmate of Donaldson's and a longtime family friend, asked O'Connor to release Donaldson to his care. On each occasion O'Connor refused. The record shows that Lembecke was a serious and responsible person, who was willing and able to assume responsibility for Donaldson's welfare.

The evidence showed that Donaldson's confinement was a simple regime of enforced custodial care, not a program designed to alleviate or cure his supposed illness. Numerous witnesses, including one of O'Connor's codefendants, testified that Donaldson had received nothing but custodial care while at the hospital. O'Connor described Donaldson's treatment as "milieu therapy."

But witnesses from the hospital staff conceded that, in the context of this case, "milieu therapy" was a euphemism for confinement in the "milieu" of a mental hospital.<sup>4</sup> For substantial periods, Donaldson was simply kept in a large room that housed 60 patients, many of whom were under criminal commitment. Donaldson's requests for ground privileges, occupational training, and an opportunity to discuss his case with O'Connor or other staff members were repeatedly denied.

At the trial, O'Connor's principal defense was that he had acted in good faith and was therefore immune from any liability for monetary damages. His position, in short, was that state law, which he had believed valid, had authorized indefinite custodial confinement of the "sick," even if they were not given treatment and their release could harm no one.<sup>5</sup>

The trial judge instructed the members of the jury that they should find that O'Connor had violated Donaldson's constitutional right to liberty if they found that he had

"confined [Donaldson] against his will, knowing that he was not mentally ill or dangerous or knowing that

<sup>4</sup> There was some evidence that Donaldson, who is a Christian Scientist, on occasion refused to take medication. The trial judge instructed the jury not to award damages for any period of confinement during which Donaldson had declined treatment.

<sup>5</sup> At the close of Donaldson's case-in-chief, O'Connor moved for a directed verdict on the ground that state law at the time of Donaldson's confinement authorized institutionalization of the mentally ill even if they posed no danger to themselves or others. This motion was denied. At the close of all the evidence, O'Connor asked that the jury be instructed that "if the defendants acted pursuant to a statute which was not declared unconstitutional at the time, they cannot be held accountable for such action." The District Court declined to give this requested instruction.

if mentally ill he was not receiving treatment for his mental illness . . . .

"Now the purpose of involuntary hospitalization is treatment and not mere custodial care or punishment if a patient is not a danger to himself or others. Without such treatment there is no justification from a constitutional standpoint for continued confinement unless you should also find that [Donaldson] was dangerous either to himself or others."*

* The District Court defined treatment as follows:

"You are instructed that a person who is involuntarily civilly committed to a mental hospital does have a constitutional right to receive such treatment as will give him a realistic opportunity to be cured or to improve his mental condition." (Emphasis added.)

O'Connor argues that this statement suggests that a mental patient has a right to treatment even if confined by reason of dangerousness to himself or others. But this is to take the above paragraph out of context, for it is bracketed by paragraphs making clear the trial judge's theory that treatment is constitutionally required only if mental illness alone, rather than danger to self or others, is the reason for confinement. If O'Connor had thought the instructions ambiguous on this point, he could have objected to them and requested a clarification. He did not do so. We accordingly have no occasion here to decide whether persons committed on grounds of dangerousness enjoy a "right to treatment."

In pertinent part, the instructions read as follows:

"The Plaintiff claims in brief that throughout the period of his hospitalization he was not mentally ill or dangerous to himself or others, and claims further that if he was mentally ill, or if Defendants believed he was mentally ill, Defendants withheld from him the treatment necessary to improve his mental condition.

"The Defendants claim, in brief, that Plaintiff's detention was legal and proper, or if his detention was not legal and proper, it was the result of mistake, without malicious intent.

"In order to prove his claim under the Civil Rights Act, the burden is upon the Plaintiff in this case to establish by a preponderance of the evidence in this case the following facts:

"That the Defendants confined Plaintiff against his will, know-

The trial judge further instructed the jury that O'Connor was immune from damages if he

"reasonably believed in good faith that detention of [Donaldson] was proper for the length of time he was so confined . . . .

"However, mere good intentions which do not give rise to a reasonable belief that detention is lawfully required cannot justify [Donaldson's] confinement in the Florida State Hospital."

The jury returned a verdict for Donaldson against O'Connor and a codefendant, and awarded damages of $38,500, including $10,000 in punitive damages.<sup>7</sup>

The Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment of the District Court in a broad opinion dealing with "the far-reaching question whether the Fourteenth Amendment guarantees a right to treatment to persons involuntarily ing that he was not mentally ill or dangerous or knowing that if mentally ill he was not receiving treatment for his mental illness.

"[T]hat the Defendants' acts and conduct deprived the Plaintiff of his Federal Constitutional right not to be denied or deprived of his liberty without due process of law as that phrase is defined and explained in these instructions . . . .

"You are instructed that a person who is involuntarily civilly committed to a mental hospital does have a constitutional right to receive such treatment as will give him a realistic opportunity to be cured or to improve his mental condition.

"Now the purpose of involuntary hospitalization is treatment and not mere custodial care or punishment if a patient is not a danger to himself or others. Without such treatment there is no justification from a constitutional stand-point for continued confinement unless you should also find that the Plaintiff was dangerous either to himself or others."

<sup>7</sup>The trial judge had instructed that punitive damages should be awarded only if "the act or omission of the Defendant or Defendants which proximately caused injury to the Plaintiff was maliciously or wantonly or oppressively done."

civilly committed to state mental hospitals." 493 F. 2d, at 509. The appellate court held that when, as in Donaldson's case, the rationale for confinement is that the patient is in need of treatment, the Constitution requires that minimally adequate treatment in fact be provided. Id., at 521. The court further expressed the view that, regardless of the grounds for involuntary civil commitment, a person confined against his will at a state mental institution has "a constitutional right to receive such individual treatment as will give him a reasonable opportunity to be cured or to improve his mental condition." Id., at 520. Conversely, the court's opinion implied that it is constitutionally permissible for a State to confine a mentally ill person against his will in order to treat his illness, regardless of whether his illness renders him dangerous to himself or others. See id., at 522-527.

II

We have concluded that the difficult issues of constitutional law dealt with by the Court of Appeals are not presented by this case in its present posture. Specifically, there is no reason now to decide whether mentally ill persons dangerous to themselves or to others have a right to treatment upon compulsory confinement by the State, or whether the State may compulsorily confine a nondangerous, mentally ill individual for the purpose of treatment. As we view it, this case raises a single, relatively simple, but nonetheless important question concerning every man's constitutional right to liberty.

The jury found that Donaldson was neither dangerous to himself nor dangerous to others, and also found that, if mentally ill, Donaldson had not received treatment.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>8</sup> Given the jury instructions, see n. 6 supra, it is possible that the jury went so far as to find that O'Connor knew not only that Donaldson was harmless to himself and others but also that he was

That verdict, based on abundant evidence, makes the issue before the Court a narrow one. We need not decide whether, when, or by what procedures, a mentally ill person may be confined by the State on any of the grounds which, under contemporary statutes, are generally advanced to justify involuntary confinement of such a person—to prevent injury to the public, to ensure his own survival or safety,<sup>9</sup> or to alleviate or cure his illness. See Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U. S. 715, 736–737; Humphrey v. Cady, 405 U. S. 504, 509. For the jury found that none of the above grounds for continued confinement was present in Donaldson's case.<sup>10</sup> not mentally ill at all. If it so found, the jury was permitted by the instructions to rule against O'Connor regardless of the nature of the "treatment" provided. If we were to construe the jury's verdict in that fashion, there would remain no substantial issue in this case: That a wholly sane and innocent person has a constitutional right not to be physically confined by the State when his freedom will pose a danger neither to himself nor to others cannot be seriously doubted.

<sup>9</sup> The judge's instructions used the phrase "dangerous to himself." Of course, even if there is no foreseeable risk of self-injury or suicide, a person is literally "dangerous to himself" if for physical or other reasons he is helpless to avoid the hazards of freedom either through his own efforts or with the aid of willing family members or friends. While it might be argued that the judge's instructions could have been more detailed on this point, O'Connor raised no objection to them, presumably because the evidence clearly showed that Donaldson was not "dangerous to himself" however broadly that phrase might be defined.

<sup>10</sup> O'Connor argues that, despite the jury's verdict, the Court must assume that Donaldson was receiving treatment sufficient to justify his confinement, because the adequacy of treatment is a "nonjusticiable" question that must be left to the discretion of the psychiatric profession. That argument is unpersuasive. Where "treatment" is the sole asserted ground for depriving a person of liberty, it is plainly unacceptable to suggest that the courts are powerless to determine whether the asserted ground is present. See Jackson v. Indiana, supra. Neither party objected to the jury instruction defining treatment. There is, accordingly, no occasion in this case to decide whether the provision of treatment, standing alone, can ever constitutionally justify involuntary confinement or, if it can, how much or what kind of treatment would suffice for that purpose. In its present posture this case involves not involuntary treatment but simply involuntary custodial confinement.

Given the jury's findings, what was left as justification for keeping Donaldson in continued confinement? The fact that state law may have authorized confinement of the harmless mentally ill does not itself establish a constitutionally adequate purpose for the confinement. See Jackson v. Indiana, supra, at 720-723; McNeil v. Director, Patuxent Institution, 407 U. S. 245, 248-250. Nor is it enough that Donaldson's original confinement was founded upon a constitutionally adequate basis, if in fact it was, because even if his involuntary confinement was initially permissible, it could not constitutionally continue after that basis no longer existed. Jackson v. Indiana, supra, at 738; McNeil v. Director, Patuxent Institution, supra.

A finding of "mental illness" alone cannot justify a State's locking a person up against his will and keeping him indefinitely in simple custodial confinement. Assuming that that term can be given a reasonably precise content and that the "mentally ill" can be identified with reasonable accuracy, there is still no constitutional basis for confining such persons involuntarily if they are dangerous to no one and can live safely in freedom.

May the State confine the mentally ill merely to ensure them a living standard superior to that they enjoy in the private community? That the State has a proper interest in providing care and assistance to the unfortunate goes without saying. But the mere presence of mental illness does not disqualify a person from preferring his home to the comforts of an institution.

Moreover, while the State may arguably confine a person to save him from harm, incarceration is rarely if ever a necessary condition for raising the living standards of those capable of surviving safely in freedom, on their own or with the help of family or friends. See Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479, 488-490.

May the State fence in the harmless mentally ill solely to save its citizens from exposure to those whose ways are different? One might as well ask if the State, to avoid public unease, could incarcerate all who are physically unattractive or socially eccentric. Mere public intolerance or animosity cannot constitutionally justify the deprivation of a person's physical liberty. See, e. g., Cohen v. California, 403 U. S. 15, 24-26; Coates v. City of Cincinnati, 402 U. S. 611, 615; Street v. New York, 394 U. S. 576, 592; cf. United States Dept. of Agric. v. Moreno, 413 U. S. 528, 534.

In short, a State cannot constitutionally confine without more a nondangerous individual who is capable of surviving safely in freedom by himself or with the help of willing and responsible family members or friends. Since the jury found, upon ample evidence, that O'Connor, as an agent of the State, knowingly did so confine Donaldson, it properly concluded that O'Connor violated Donaldson's constitutional right to freedom.

III

O'Connor contends that in any event he should not be held personally liable for monetary damages because his decisions were made in "good faith." Specifically, O'Connor argues that he was acting pursuant to state law which, he believed, authorized confinement of the mentally ill even when their release would not compromise their safety or constitute a danger to others, and that he could not reasonably have been expected to know that the state law as he understood it was constitutionally invalid. A proposed instruction to this effect was rejected by the District Court.<sup>11</sup>

The District Court did instruct the jury, without objection, that monetary damages could not be assessed against O'Connor if he had believed reasonably and in good faith that Donaldson's continued confinement was "proper," and that punitive damages could be awarded only if O'Connor had acted "maliciously or wantonly or oppressively." The Court of Appeals approved those instructions. But that court did not consider whether it was error for the trial judge to refuse the additional instruction concerning O'Connor's claimed reliance on state law as authorization for Donaldson's continued confinement. Further, neither the District Court nor the Court of Appeals acted with the benefit of this Court's most recent decision on the scope of the qualified immunity possessed by state officials under 42 U. S. C. § 1983. Wood v. Strickland, — U. S. —.

Under that decision, the relevant question for the jury is whether O'Connor "knew or reasonably should have known that the action he took within his sphere of official responsibility would violate the constitutional rights of [Donaldson], or if he took the action with the malicious intention to cause a deprivation of constitutional rights or other injury to [Donaldson]." Id., —. See also Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U. S. 232, 247-248; Wood v. Strickland, supra, at — (opinion of POWELL, J.). For purposes of this question, an official has, of course, no duty to anticipate unforeseeable constitutional developments. Wood v. Strickland, supra, at —.

<sup>11</sup> See n. 5, supra. During his years of confinement, Donaldson unsuccessfully petitioned the state and federal courts for release from the Florida State Hospital on a number of occasions. None of these claims was ever resolved on its merits, and no evidentiary hearings were ever held. O'Connor has not contended that he relied on these unsuccessful court actions as an independent intervening reason for continuing Donaldson's confinement, and no instructions on this score were requested.

Accordingly, we vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals and remand the case to enable that court to consider, in light of Wood v. Strickland, whether the District Judge's failure to instruct with regard to the effect of O'Connor's claimed reliance on state law rendered inadequate the instructions as to O'Connor's liability for compensatory and punitive damages.<sup>12</sup>

It is so ordered.

<sup>12</sup> Upon remand, the Court of Appeals is to consider only the question whether O'Connor is to be held liable for monetary damages for violating Donaldson's constitutional right to liberty. The jury found, on substantial evidence and under adequate instructions, that O'Connor deprived Donaldson, who was dangerous neither to himself nor to others and was provided no treatment, of the constitutional right to liberty. Cf. n. 8, supra. That finding needs no further consideration. If the Court of Appeals holds that a remand to the District Court is necessary, the only issue to be determined in that court will be whether O'Connor is immune from liability for monetary damages.

Of necessity our decision vacating the judgment of the Court of Appeals deprives that court's opinion of precedential effect, leaving this Court's opinion and judgment as the sole law of the case. See United States v. Munsingwear, 340 U. S. 36.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 74-8

J. B. O'Connor,
Petitioner,
v.
Kenneth Donaldson.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

[June 26, 1975]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER, concurring.

Although I join the Court's opinion and judgment in this case, it seems to me that several factors merit more emphasis than it gives them. I therefore add the following remarks.

I

With respect to the remand to the Court of Appeals on the issue of official immunity,<sup>1</sup> it seems to me not entirely irrelevant that there was substantial evidence that Donaldson consistently refused treatment that was offered to him, claiming that he was not mentally ill and needed no treatment.<sup>2</sup> The Court appropriately takes notice of the uncertainties of <sup>1</sup> I have difficulty understanding how the issue of immunity can be resolved on this record and hence it is very likely a new trial may be required; if that is the case I would hope these sensitive and important issues would have the benefit of more effective presentation and articulation on behalf of petitioner.

<sup>2</sup> The Court's reference to "milieu therapy," ante, at 5, may be construed as disparaging that concept. True, it is capable of being used simply to cloak official indifference, but the reality is that some mental abnormalities respond to no known treatment. Also some mental patients respond, as do persons suffering from a variety of physiological ailments, to what is loosely called "milieu treatment," i. e., keeping them comfortable, well-nourished, and in a protected environment. It is not for us to say in the baffling field of psychiatry that "milieu therapy" is always a pretense.

psychiatric diagnosis and therapy, and the reported cases are replete with evidence of the divergence of medical opinion in this vexing area. E. g., Greenwood v. United States, 350 U. S. 366, 375 (1957). See also Drope v. Missouri — U. S. — (1975). Nonetheless, one of the few areas of agreement among behaviorial specialists is that an uncooperative patient cannot benefit from therapy and that the first step in effective treatment is acknowledgement by the patient that he is suffering from an abnormal condition. See, e. g., Katz, The Right to Treatment—An Enchanting Legal Fiction? 36 U. Chi. L. Rev. 755, 768–769 (1969). Donaldson's adamant refusal to do so should be taken into account in considering petitioner's good-faith defense.

Perhaps more important to the issue of immunity is a factor referred to only obliquely in the Court's opinion. On numerous occasions during the period of his confinement Donaldson unsuccessfully sought release in the Florida courts; indeed, the last of these proceedings was terminated only a few months prior to the bringing of this action. See Donaldson v. O'Connor, 234 So. 2d 114 (Fla.), cert. denied, 400 U. S. 869 (1970). Whatever the reasons for the state courts' repeated denials of relief, and regardless of whether they correctly resolved the issue tendered to them, petitioner and the other members of the medical staff at Florida State Hospital would surely have been justified in considering each such judicial decision as an approval of continued confinement and an independent intervening reason for continuing Donaldson's confinement. Thus, this fact is inescapably related to the issue of immunity and must be considered by the Court of Appeals on remand and, if a new trial is ordered, by the District Court.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> That petitioner's counsel failed to raise this issue is not a reason why it should not be considered with respect to immunity in light

II

As the Court points out, ante, at 7 n. 6, the District Court instructed the jury in part that "a person who is involuntarily civilly committed to a mental hospital does have a constitutional right to receive such treatment as will give him a realistic opportunity to be cured," (emphasis added) and the Court of Appeals unequivocally approved this phrase, standing alone, as a correct statement of the law. O'Connor v. Donaldson, 493 F. 2d 507, 520 (CA5 1974). The Court's opinion plainly gives no approval to that holding and makes clear that it binds neither the parties to this case nor the courts of the Fifth Circuit. See ante, at 14 n. 12. Moreover, in light of its importance for future litigation in this area, it should be emphasized that the Court of Appeals' analysis has no basis in the decisions of this Court.

A

There can be no doubt that involuntary commitment to a mental hospital, like involuntary confinement of an individual for any reason, is a deprivation of liberty which the State cannot accomplish without due process of law. Specht v. Patterson, 386 U. S., at 608. Cf. In re Gault, 387 U. S. 1, 12-13 (1967). Commitment must be justified on the basis of a legitimate state interest, and the reasons for committing a particular individual must be established in an appropriate proceeding. Equally important, confinement must cease when those reasons no longer exist. See McNeil v. Director, Patuxent Institution, 407 U. S., at 249-250; Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U. S., at 738.

The Court of Appeals purported to be applying these principles in developing the first of its theories support-of the Court's holding that the defense was preserved for appellate review.

ing a constitutional right to treatment. It first identified what it perceived to be the traditional bases for civil commitment—physical dangerousness to oneself or others, or a need for treatment—and stated:

“[W]here, as in Donaldson's case, the rationale for confinement is the ‘parens patriae’ rationale that the patient is in need of treatment, the due process clause requires that minimally adequate treatment be in fact provided . . . . ‘To deprive any citizen of his or her liberty upon the altruistic theory that the confinement is for humane therapeutic reasons and then fail to provide adequate treatment violates the very fundamentals of due process.’ 493 F. 2d, at 521.

The Court of Appeals did not explain its conclusion that the rationale for respondent's commitment was that he needed treatment. The Florida statutes in effect during the period of his confinement did not require that a person who had been adjudicated incompetent and ordered committed either be provided with psychiatric treatment or released, and there was no such condition in respondent's order of commitment. Cf. Rouse v. Cameron, — U. S. App. D. C. —, 373 F. 2d 451 (1966). More important, the instructions which the Court of Appeals read as establishing an absolute constitutional right to treatment did not require the jury to make any findings regarding the specific reasons for respondent's confinement or to focus upon any rights he may have had under state law. Thus, the premise of the Court of Appeals' first theory must have been that, at least with respect to persons who are not physically dangerous, a State has no power to confine the mentally ill except for the purpose of providing them with treatment.

That proposition is surely not descriptive of the power traditionally exercised by the States in this area.

Historically, and for a considerable period of time, subsidized custodial care in private foster homes or boarding houses was the most benign form of care provided incompetent or mentally ill persons for whom the States assumed responsibility. Until well into the 19th century the vast majority of such persons were simply restrained in poorhouses, almshouses, or jails. See A. Deutsch, The Mentally Ill in America 38-54, 114-131 (2d ed. 1949). The few States that established institutions for the mentally ill during this early period were concerned primarily with providing a more humane place of confinement and only secondarily with "curing" the persons sent there. See id., at 98-113.

As the trend toward state care of the mentally ill expanded, eventually leading to the present statutory schemes for protecting such persons, the dual functions of institutionalization continued to be recognized. While one of the goals of this movement was to provide medical treatment to those who could benefit from it, it was acknowledged that this could not be done in all cases and that there was a large range of mental illness for which no known "cure" existed. In time, providing places for the custodial confinement of the so-called "dependent insane" again emerged as the major goal of the State's programs in this area and continued to be so well into this century. See id., at 228-271; D. Rothman, The Discovery of the Asylum 264-295 (1971).

In short, the idea that States may not confine the mentally ill except for the purpose of providing them with treatment is of very recent origin,<sup>4</sup> and there is no historical basis for imposing such a limitation on state power. Analysis of the sources of the civil commitment power likewise lends no support to that notion. There can be little doubt that in the exercise of its police power a State may confine individuals solely to protect society from the dangers of significant antisocial acts or communicable disease. Cf. Minnesota ex rel. Pearson v. Probate Court, 309 U. S. 270; Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 1, 25-29 (1905). Additionally, the States are vested with the historic parens patriae power, including the duty to protect "persons under legal disabilities to act for themselves." Hawaii v. Standard Oil Co., 405 U. S. 251, 257 (1972). See also Mormon Church v. United States, 136 U. S. 1, 56-58 (1890). The classic example of this role is when a State undertakes to act as "the general guardian of all infants, idiots, and lunatics." Hawaii v. Standard Oil Co., supra, quoting 3 W. Blackstone, Commentaries *47.

Of course, an inevitable consequence of exercising the parens patriae power is that the ward's personal freedom will be substantially restrained, whether a guardian is appointed to control his property, he is placed in the custody of a private third party, or committed to an institution. Thus, however the power is implemented, due process requires that it not be invoked indiscriminately. At a minimum, a particular scheme for protection of the mentally ill must rest upon a legislative determination that it is compatible with the best interests of the affected class and that its members are unable to act for themselves. Cf. Mormon Church v. United States, supra. Moreover, the use of alternative forms of protection may be motivated by different considerations, and the justifications for one may not be invoked to rationalize another. Cf. Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U. S., at 737-738. See also American Bar Foundation, The Mentally Disabled and the Law, 254-255 (S. Brakel & R. Rock ed. 1971).

However, the existence of some due process limitations on the parens patriae power does not justify the further conclusion that it may be exercised to confine a mentally ill person only if the purpose of the confinement is treatment. Despite many recent advances in medical knowledge, it remains a stubborn fact that there are many forms of mental illness which are not understood, some which are untreatable in the sense that no effective therapy has yet been discovered for them, and that rates of "cure" are generally low. See Schwitzgebel, The Right to Effective Mental Treatment, 62 Calif. L. Rev. 936, 941-948 (1974). There can be little responsible debate regarding "the uncertainty of diagnosis in this field and the tentativeness of professional judgment." Greenwood v. United States, 350 U. S. 366, 375 (1957). See also Ennis and Litwack, Psychiatry and the Presumption of Expertise: Flipping Coins in the Courtroom, 62 Calif. L. Rev. 693, 697-719 (1974).<sup>5</sup> Similarly, as previously observed, it is universally recognized as fundamental to effective therapy that the patient acknowledge his illness and cooperate with those attempting to give treatment; yet the failure of a large proportion of mentally ill persons to do so is a common phenomenon. See Katz, supra, 36 U. Chi. L. Rev., at 768-769 (1969). It may be that some persons in either of these categories,<sup>6</sup> and there may be others, are unable to function in society and will suffer real harm to themselves unless provided with care in a sheltered environment. See, e. g., Lake v. Cameron, — U. S. App. D. C.

<sup>5</sup> Indeed, there is considerable debate concerning the threshold questions of what constitutes "mental disease" and "treatment." See Szasz, The Right to Health, 57 Geo. L. J. 734 (1969).

<sup>6</sup> Indeed, respondent may have shared both of these characteristics. His illness, paranoid schizophrenia, is notoriously unsuceptible to treatment, see Livermore, Malmquist, and Meehl, On the Justifications for Civil Commitment, 117 U. Pa. L. Rev. 75, 93 & n. 52 (1968), and the reports of the Florida State Hospital Staff which were introduced into evidence expressed the view that he was unwilling to acknowledge his illness and generally uncooperative.

—, 364 F. 2d 657, 663–664 (1966) (dissenting opinion). At the very least, I am not able to say that a state legislature is powerless to make that kind of judgment. See Greenwood v. United States, supra.

B

Alternatively, it has been argued that a Fourteenth Amendment right to treatment for involuntarily confined mental patients derives from the fact that many of the safeguards of the criminal process are not present in civil commitment. The Court of Appeals described this theory as follows:

“[A] due process right to treatment is based on the principle that when the three central limitations on the government's power to detain—that detention be in retribution for a specific offense; that it be limited to a fixed term; and that it be permitted after a proceeding where the fundamental procedural safeguards are observed—are absent, there must be a quid pro quo extended by the government to justify confinement. And the quid pro quo most commonly recognized is the provision of rehabilitative treatment.” 493 F. 2d, at 522.

To the extent that this theory may be read to permit a State to confine an individual simply because it is willing to provide treatment, regardless of the subject's ability to function in society, it raises the gravest of constitutional problems, and I have no doubt the Court of Appeals would agree on this score. As a justification for a constitutional right to such treatment, the quid pro quo theory suffers from equally serious defects.

It is too well established to require extended discussion that due process is not an inflexible concept. Rather, its requirements are determined in particular instances by identifying and accommodating the interests of the individual and society. See, e. g., Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U. S. 471, 480-484 (1972); McNeil v. Director, Patuxent Institution, 407 U. S., at 249-250; McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U. S. 528, 545-555 (1971). Where claims that the State is acting in the best interests of an individual are said to justify reduced procedural and substantive safeguards, this Court's decisions require that they be "candidly appraised." In re Gault, 387 U. S., at 21, 27-29. However, in so doing judges are not free to read their private notions of public policy or public health into the Constitution. Olsen v. Nebraska, 313 U. S. 236, 246-247 (1941).

The quid pro quo theory is a sharp departure from, and cannot coexist with, these due process principles. As an initial matter, the theory presupposes that essentially the same interests are involved in every situation where a State seeks to confine an individual; that assumption, however, is incorrect. It is elementary that the justification for the criminal process and the unique deprivation of liberty which it can impose requires that it be invoked only for commission of a specific offense prohibited by legislative enactment. See Powell v. Texas, 392 U. S. 514, 541-544 (1968) (opinion of Black, J.).<sup>7</sup> But it would be incongruous to apply the same limitation when quarantine is imposed by the State to protect the public from a highly communicable disease. See Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S., at 29-30.

<sup>7</sup> This is not to imply that I accept all of the Court of Appeals' conclusions regarding the limitations upon the States' power to detain persons who commit crimes. For example, the notion that confinement must be "for a fixed term" is difficult to square with the widespread practice of indeterminate sentencing, at least where the upper limit is life.

A more troublesome feature of the quid pro quo theory is that it elevates a concern for essentially procedural safeguards into a new substantive constitutional right.<sup>8</sup> Rather than inquiring whether strict standards of proof or periodic redetermination of a patient's condition are required in civil confinement, the theory accepts the absence of such safeguards but insists that the State provide benefits which, in the view of a court, are adequate "compensation" for confinement. In light of the wide divergence of medical opinion regarding the diagnosis of and proper therapy for mental abnormalities, that prospect is especially troubling in this area and cannot be squared with the principle that "courts may not substitute for the judgments of legislators their own understanding of the public welfare, but must instead concern themselves with the validity of the methods which the legislature has selected." In re Gault, 387 U. S., at 71 (opinion of Harlan, J.). Of course, questions regarding the adequacy of procedure and the power of a State to continue particular confinements are ultimately for the courts, aided by expert opinion to the extent that is found helpful. But I am not persuaded that we should abandon the traditional limitations on the scope of judicial review.

C

In sum, I cannot accept the reasoning of the Court of Appeals and can discern no other basis for equating an involuntarily committed mental patient's unquestioned constitutional right not to be confined without due process of law with a constitutional right to treatment.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>8</sup> Even advocates of a right to treatment have criticized the quid pro quo theory on this ground. E. g., Note, Developments in the Law—Civil Commitment of the Mentally Ill, 87 Harv. L. Rev. 1190, 1325, n. 39 (1974).

<sup>9</sup> It should be pointed out that several issues which the Court has touched upon in other contexts are not involved here. As

Given the present state of medical knowledge regarding abnormal human behavior and its treatment, few things would be more fraught with peril than to irrevocably condition a State's power to protect the mentally ill upon the providing of "such treatment as will give [them] a realistic opportunity to be cured." Nor can I accept the theory that a State may lawfully confine an individual thought to need treatment and justify that deprivation the Court's opinion makes plain, this is not a case of a person seeking release because he has been confined "without ever obtaining a judicial determination that such confinement is warranted." McNeil v. Director, Patuxent Institution, 407 U. S. 245, 249 (1972). Although respondent's amended complaint alleged that his 1956 hearing before the Pinellas County Court was procedurally defective and ignored various factors relating to the necessity for commitment, the persons to whom those allegations applied were either not served with process or dismissed by the District Court prior to trial. Respondent has not sought review of the latter rulings, and this case does not involve the rights of a person in an initial competency or commitment proceeding. Cf. Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U. S. 715, 738 (1972); Specht v. Patterson, 386 U. S. 605 (1967); Minnesota ex rel. Pearson v. Probate Court, 309 U. S. 270 (1940).

Further, it was not alleged that respondent was singled out for discriminatory treatment by the staff of Florida State Hospital or that patients at that institution were denied privileges generally available to other persons under commitment in Florida. Thus, the question whether different bases for commitment justify differences in conditions of confinement is not involved in this litigation. Cf. Jackson v. Indiana, supra, at 723-730; Bazstrom v. Herold, 383 U. S. 107 (1966).

Finally, there was no evidence whatever that respondent was abused or mistreated at Florida State Hospital or that the failure to provide him with treatment aggravated his condition. There was testimony regarding the general quality of life at the hospital, but the jury was not asked to consider whether respondent's confinement was in effect "punishment" for being mentally ill. The record provides no basis for concluding, therefore, that respondent was denied rights secured by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. Cf. Robinson v. California, 370 U. S. 650 (1962).

of liberty solely by providing some treatment. Our concepts of due process would not tolerate such a "trade-off." Because the Court of Appeals' analysis could be read as authorizing those results, it should not be followed.
